What do you see?	A library site with a oval-shaped menu, and the color of the site is based on blue and yellow.	I see the UCLA Library website with a description, library hours, and several site options like resources , news and events, navigating the library, locations etc	UCLA library homepage
What do you think that web/app is about?	If the site does not emphasize this is a library website, I would think it's a site about American football based on the shape of the main menu.	It's an info and resources site for the UCLA library	Getting info on the libraries at UCLA (hours etc)
What do you think you can do with this web/app?	Find academic resources and the location & time of the UCLA library	I feel like I can find a vast range of relevant information about the library's resources and operations	Find the hours, search for events
Any other comments?			I appreciate that this is less busy than the regular UCLA library website
Is there any point that the users may not understand what this screen(feedback) is about?	The list of libraries can be pointed out in the first screen. For me, I don't usually click "About Us" to find information about other libraries.		It is clear that I am on the "About Us" page
Is there any point that the users may not recognize where to click or select?	Some texts have underline, but I'm not sure if they are trying to emphasize something or they are links to other pages	The beginning maybe? Maybe it's just because the main menu items are not clickable yet	I like the underlined text in the bubbles at the bottomclea
Is there any point that the users may feel lost and may not sure whether the progress is being made toward what they want to achieve?	When I was trying to use "Navigating the library," the button did not work. Since the scenario is Kiara who wants to navigate through the library site, I assume she wants to use this button to find what she wants.	I feel like when I landed on the about us page I lost track of where I was in Kiara's task because it wasn't the most obvious spot to go for her specific needs

Is there any point that the users would not know what to do the next step?	The button "Back" and "Next" are not distinctive enough. Probably because of the color or position	I think for the first step, I expected to click on resources to achieve Kiara's task but since that part isn't built yet it took me a while to find the menu that led me to all the info about specific libraries.
Is there any point that is not clear where to return or missing back-flow of cancel or exit?	I click the site heading to go back to the home page every time I finish reading a page, so it would be kind of inconvenient.	The back and next buttons are helpful!	Clear back and next buttons
Is there anything inconsistent, missing, or confusing?	The shape of each button would be somehow confusing		Not all libraries on campus are listed. I don't know if the Next button is necessary, I think if the user wants to look at other locations they can go back to the last page they were on. I would like to be able to search for a book or article on the homepage
Any other comments?	Overall, it looks good and clear. But make sure the shape of the buttons and the font size (subheading and actual content)	Excited to see your final prototype :)	NA
